The Via Francigena

Today, the Via Francigena is a lesser-known pilgrimage route. Toward the end of the first millennium and the beginning of the second, pilgrimage gained increasing importance among European Christians. Christian holy places included Jerusalem, Rome and Santiago de Compostela. The Via Francigena—the road from France—became the central hub of pilgrimages, also known as the great ways of faith.

The Via Francigena pilgrimage began at the Canterbury Cathedral in England, crossing France, Switzerland and Italy ending at Saint Peter's Cathedral at the Vatican in Rome. On a typical day, as many as 3,000 people used the route, including pilgrims, traders, merchants, scholars and other travelers. Pilgrims usually travelled in large groups and walked about eight hours per day. Inns, canonries (the office of those who are approved by the pope to practice ecclesiastical rule or law), and monasteries, served pilgrims along the way. Over time, pilgrimages lost popularity and alternative commercial routes replaced the Via Francigena.

In 990, Archbishop Sigeric the Serious walked the Via Francigena to St. Peter's to collect his cloak of office from the Pope. He recorded his journey in detail. These diaries were discovered in the 1980s and pieced together by academics. Details provided by these diaries allowed the ancient route to be reconstructed and in 1985 pilgrims walked it again for the first time in hundreds of years. The Italian government has since invested in its reconstruction for use by pilgrims. It is a beautiful walk with transformative powers.
